vertising Medium it has no competitor.

After suffering of the most intense description, succeeded by a long period of unconsciousness, James Gillespie Blaine this morning succumbed to the prolonged assault of unconquerable disease. Heroic efforts were made by the distinguished invalid and by his medical attendants to draw life's thread out to its greatest possible length, but the hour came when all efforts were unavailing; when one of Amer ica's most brilliant statesmen met the fate which sooner or later comes to all flesh. No other man of his time was so conspicuous as he and no other has left more indelible impress upon the history of the now-dying generation. He was possessed of an ambition that knew no limit, for it was based upon the possibilities of national growthwhich to his keen vision were without bounds. From an humble beginning he arose to power such as is given to but few, yet he was denied the presidency by men who feared his positive nature and could not understand his advanced patriotism. That occasion will develop Americans as great as he is not to be doubted, but that his peer is in public life today will hardly be claimed even by those who loved him not.

To even the casual observer there is evident much difference of opinion between Secretary Elkins on the one hand and Gen. Casey and Maj. Chas. E. L. B. Davis on the other as to the public's rights in connection with the Long bridge. Secretary Elkins, who, being a railroad man, is inclined to be liberal with his associates, says: "In my judgment the better plan by far would be to authorize the railroad company to construct a new bridge when necessary, exclusively for railroad purposes, at its own expense, and the government to build a wagon road bridge at the most suitable point for public travel."

Maj. Davis, who is a practical and skilled engineer officer, says: "Two bridges at this point would in every way be detrimental to the interests of navigation of the United States and the citizens of Washington, and I recommend that such a proposition be not entertained. Nor do I see any reason why Congress should donate the present bridge to the railway company and impose upon the people the cost of a new bridge. The existing bridge was built by and belonged to the United States. It was then put into the possession of the railway company on the condition that it should be maintained as a bridge for highway travel. Now the railway company proposes by this bill to appropriate the entire bridge to its own use as a corporation and let the United States or the District of Columbia build one for highway travel." Comment would be superfluous.

And now Italy has a great national scandal on its hands, large enough to distract Italian attention from France and its Panama troubles. The cloud has been visible for sometime past, and although no larger than a man's hand it looked like the hand of a prominent statesman and seemed to be full of somebody's money. Now the cloud has grown until it has the appearance of several hands, and the evidence that they were all palm upward seems to be quite clear. Several days ago THE STAR announced the arrest of Gov. Taulongo and Cashier Lazzaroni of the Banca Romana, and later it told of the arrest of Manager Cucinello of the Bank of Naples, who was charged with the embezzlement of 2,000,000 lire. Two of the banks have closed their doors and other financial institutions are said to be on the verge of prostration. Wholesale arrests are expected. because there are allegations of crookedness on the part of prominent individuals and newstary inquiry is being resisted by the ministry, but unless there are extraordinary changes in the really grave situation ministerial stubbornness will not avail.

Faithful to its duty as the purveyor of news to the District of Columbia THE STAR was first among the journals of this city to announce the death of James G. Blaine At 11 o'clock the ex-premier breathed for the last time, and in less than six minutes after this hour THE EVENING STATE was on the streets with the announcement and much biographical and other interesting matter. The history of this great man's struggle with death has been told by THE STAR with unrivaled completeness and accurace. It was THE STAR that first made known to the people of the country the critical nature of Mr. Blaine's illness, and from that sorrowful day to this every detail of legitimate public interest concerning the condition of the man in respect to whom the whole republic felt a profound concern, has appeared in its columns. Following the first "extra" of this morning were two other editions, each containing ad ditional news, and all, from first to last, so very far in advance of any other paper as to satis factorily maintain THE STAR'S reputation as a faithful servant of the people and the newspaper of Washington.
